Blood Brother: The Gene That Rocked My Family offers a brave and nuanced take on one of the most radioactive issues of our times: genetic testing. When her beloved brother, Jim, is diagnosed with Huntington's disease - a fatal brain disease - author Mona Gable is suddenly thrust into alien, frightening territory without a road map to guide her. Still, as she recovers from the shock of her brother's death, decisions must be made. To get tested or not? To inform her children that they may also be at risk? To speak openly and publicly about a disease that historically has been cloaked in secrecy and shame? This is a must-listen for anyone who has grappled with similar issues or who suspects that they, too, may have inherited a deadly gene.

Gable writes about women's issues, health, science, travel, and international issues. Her work has appeared in Prevention, Fast Company, Los Angeles Magazine, the Los Angeles Times, Pacific Standard, the Wall Street Journal, and many other publications. From 2011 to 2013, she was the feminist editor of BlogHer.com and has been a contributor to the Huffington Post since 2006. Her essays have appeared in several anthologies, including The Maternal Is Political: Women Writers at the Intersection of Motherhood and Social Change and the best-selling collection of Salon essays, Mothers Who Think: Tales of Real-Life Parenthood. She is also a facilitator with the OpEd Project, a venture aimed at increasing the range of voices shaping public opinion.

What if you could find out whether you carried a gene for a life-threatening disease? Would you?

By maura dolan

This book is a personal essay, filled with scientific and social policy information, about the author's decision to be tested for a gene that would mean a disabled life and early death. In addition to her personal story, we learn how lawmakers in Washington respond to pleas from family members affected by the disease and how scientists are working to find a cure. I could not put it down.

Outstanding writing

By john n. rosenthal

Mona Gable brings the same rigor to personal writing that she does to her professional reporting. I highly recommend it.

A Compelling Story

By Paul J. Vandeventer

Mona Gable brings to life -- like a fine investigative journalist -- how she solved a family mystery, scared the hell out of herself in the process, and sought to protect her kids by unclocking the ravaging, relentless advance of an inherited disease that killed her brother. Detached at first as a way of protecting herself, Gable brings us increasingly into her own dawning awareness, horror and eventual acceptance. She doesn't hold back -- there are heroes and villains -- because that's how she rolls as a writer. She does all of us a favor by showing that courage sometimes comes merely from plowing ahead into the inevitable, come what may. A bravura, highly readable story that weighs in at about the length of a good novella.
